

WOORAMEL RIVER

YOU ARE

WELCOME To

Wooramel Station is a 356,000 acre working cattle, sheep, goat and outback station stay. The property occupies an area of 1,430 square kilometres with 60 kilometres of coastline frontage to the Indian Ocean and backs onto the Shark Bay world heritage area.

The Wooramel River is an upside down river running on the surface only 2-3 times a year for a couple of weeks at a time after good inland rains. The river cuts through the property providing well grassed flood plains, the coastal plain also provides good grazing land. Saltbush and Bluebush pastures along with Wanyu and Acacia bushland making up the remaining property. The lease was established in the early 1800s but it wasn't until the Hall family purchased the station in the 1920's that drilling was commenced for artesian water.

Three bores, with a few hundred kilometres of bore drains, were established, opening up previously unused country to stock. The artesian, via natural pressure, sends the water 240m to the surface, it maintains a constant therapeutic temperature of approx. 33°C, with a high mineral content reputed to have soothing effects on tired muscles.

The Steadman family bought the lease in 1987 and established an international goat trade to capitalise on goat numbers at the time and started a regenerative process to the rangelands. In addition, they moved from Merino sheep to a meat breed, Damara/Dorper animal which still are one of the mainstays for the business. The introduction of Droughtmaster/Angus cattle has also helped to regenerate the fragile country while still achieving economic sustainability.
